Article 8 Nationality

(Last updated: 31/08/2024)

Introduction

A “right to nationality”, similar to that in Article 15 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, is not enshrined in the text of the Convention or its Protocols. The right to acquire or to retain a particular nationality is not a “civil right” under Article 6 (Alpeyeva and Dzhalagoniya v. Russia, 2018, § 129). The revocation or annulment of citizenship, as such, is not incompatible with the Convention (Usmanov v. Russia, 2020, § 65). However, nationality is an element of a person's identity (Zeggai v. France, 2022, § 28; Ghoumid and Others v. France, 2020, § 43). An arbitrary denial of citizenship might in certain circumstances raise an issue under Article 8.

In addition, in circumstances where a member State has gone beyond its obligations under Article 8 in creating a right to citizenship by descent and has established a procedure to that end, it must ensure that the right is secured without discrimination within the meaning of Article 14 (Genovese v. Malta, 2012, § 30).

The Court has dealt with the specific issue of the revocation of citizenship (“déchéance de nationalité”) (Ramadan v. Malta, 2016) and notably in the anti-terrorism context (K2 v. the United Kingdom (dec.), 2017; Ghoumid and Others v. France, 2020).

In this context, in the leading case of Usmanov v. Russia, 2020, the Court defined the relevant methodology to be used for examining annulment of citizenship (see § 58) which it has applied to denial of nationality (Hashemi and Others v. Azerbaijan, 2022, § 47).

Additional issues can arise, notably, concerning immigration, passport, filiation, or marriage of a foreign national.

Principles drawn from the current case-law

- Even though the Convention and its Protocols do not guarantee any right to citizenship, it is not excluded that a denial of citizenship or a revocation/annulment of a citizenship already obtained (Usmanov v. Russia, 2020, §§ 59-62) may in certain circumstances raise issues under this provision given the impact/consequences such a measure has on an individual's private life. The same holds, by way of example, for a refusal of a request to renounce citizenship (Riener v. Bulgaria, 2006, §§ 155-159), the granting of citizenship in the case of marriage of a non-national (Savoia and Bounegru v. Italy (dec.), 2006) and the invalidation of passports (Alpeyeva and Dzhalagoniya v. Russia, 2018, § 115) or the refusal to issue an identity card (Ahmadov v. Azerbaijan, 2020, § 45).
- In Usmanov v. Russia, 2020, the Court clarified and consolidated the two-pronged approach to be applied in this context (having noted the existence of various approaches to the examination of the issue), later applied in Hashemi and Others v. Azerbaijan, 2022, §§ 46-49. It considered that a consequence-based approach should be followed. It examined (i) the consequences for the applicant and (ii) whether the measure was arbitrary (see § 58); see also Ahmadov v. Azerbaijan, 2020).

- In determining the consequences of a revocation of citizenship, so as to establish whether there has been an interference with the applicant's rights under Article 8 (Usmanov v. Russia, 2020, § 58), the severity of the offence committed by the applicant may be weighed against the impact of withdrawal of the applicant's citizenship on his personal and family situations (Said Abdul Salam Mubarak v. Denmark (dec.), 2019, § 70).
- For example, in Ghoumid and Others v. France, 2020, the revocation of citizenship did not affect the right to respect for "family life" because the revocation had no effect on the presence on the State's territory of the person concerned (§§ 41-42).
- Under the two-pronged approach, once an "interference" has been found, the second step in determining whether deprivation of citizenship was in breach of Article 8, is to ascertain whether it was arbitrary (Usmanov v. Russia, 2020, § 53 and §§ 62-65). As recapitulated in Usmanov v. Russia, 2020 (§§ 62-65), in determining arbitrariness, regard must be had to whether the revocation was in accordance with the law; whether it was accompanied by the necessary procedural safeguards, including whether the person deprived of citizenship was allowed the opportunity to challenge the decision before courts affording the relevant guarantees; and whether the authorities acted diligently and swiftly (Alpeyeva and Dzhalagoniya v. Russia, 2018, §§ 107-109 and the references therein, and in the context of terrorism, Ghoumid and Others v. France, 2020, §§ 45-48).
- That a long time had elapsed between the applicants' convictions and the deprivation of their nationality was not sufficient of itself to render that measure arbitrary. In particular, States might, when faced with terrorist attacks, re-assess, with greater stringency, whether individuals who had been convicted of a criminal offence constituting an act of terrorism still maintain a bond of loyalty and solidarity with the State, and might therefore, subject to a strict proportionality test, decide to take measures against them which the State had not initially chosen (Ghoumid and Others v. France, 2020, § 45).
- If a person's citizenship may be annulled or revoked on the basis that the person submitted false/incomplete information or concealed relevant information, the law should specify the nature of the disqualifying information and a reasoned decision ought to be given (Usmanov v. Russia, 2020, §§ 67-68). Other important factors must also be taken into account -in the requisite balancing exercise to be performed by the domestic authorities- in order to prevent an excessively formalistic decision (§§ 69-71).
- In Usmanov v. Russia, 2020, the annulment of the applicant's Russian citizenship did not automatically result in a decision to forcibly remove him from Russian territory; rather the question of removal was examined in a separate set of proceedings. The Court correspondingly examined the annulment of citizenship separately (§ 57).
- The principles in respect of the revocation of citizenship were also applicable in a case where the respondent State authorities had refused to issue the applicant with an identity card although a stamp in the applicant's Soviet passport had already confirmed his citizenship of the respondent State (Ahmadov v. Azerbaijan, 2020, § 45).
- Requiring a period of certain duration of the marriage of a non-national and/or a period of residence in the country are common features of legislations regulating the granting of citizenship (Savoia and Bounegru v. Italy (dec.), 2006).
- The State bears a positive obligation to provide an effective and accessible procedure, or a combination of procedures, enabling a stateless migrant to have the issues of his further stay and status determined with due regard to his private-life interests under Article 8 (Hoti v. Croatia, 2018).

- In situations where children are born as a result of surrogacy treatment, States still have to recognise the children's relationship with their biological father and establish the possibility of obtaining the father's nationality. If children are faced with a disturbing uncertainty as to the possibility of being granted their father's nationality, this is likely to adversely affect the definition of their own identity (Mennesson v. France, 2014 and Labassee v. France, 2014).
- The relevant methodology set out in Usmanov v. Russia, 2020 (§ 58), has been recently applied in the context of children born through surrogacy abroad (S.-H. v. Poland (dec.), 2021) where the Court found Article 8 inapplicable: the negative effect on the applicants' private life of their inability to obtain Polish nationality did not cross 'the threshold of seriousness' (see the application of Denisov v. Ukraine [GC], 2018 in this context and compare and contrast, Mennesson v. France, 2014 and Labassee v. France, 2014). In addition, the applicants' inability to obtain Polish nationality because they were born through surrogacy in the USA did not affect their family life, as they had dual citizenship and were residing in Israel, where legal parent-child link was recognised.

Noteworthy examples

- Kurić and Others v. Slovenia [GC], 2012 – the erasure of certain individuals from the permanent residents' register following Slovenian independence;
- Karashev v. Finland (dec.), 1999 – denial of citizenship to a person born of foreign parents;
- Riener v. Bulgaria, 2006 – rejection of a request to renounce nationality;
- Savoia and Bounegru v. Italy (dec.), 2006 – requirements laid down in the law for obtaining Italian nationality after marriage;
- Mennesson v. France, 2014 and Labassee v. France, 2014 – uncertainty for children born via surrogacy as to the possibility of being granted French nationality;
- Ramadan v. Malta, 2016 – withdrawal of citizenship following annulment of simulated marriage;
- K2 v. the United Kingdom (dec.), 2017 – deprivation of citizenship for terrorist-related activities;
- Alpeyeva and Dzhlagoniya v. Russia, 2018 – arbitrary invalidation of Russian passports issued to former Soviet nationals (as well as the relevant references therein);
- Aktaş and Aslaniskender v. Turkey, 2019 – refusal to change surname on the sole grounds that the new name requested is not Turkish (in the context of double nationality);
- Ahmadov v. Azerbaijan, 2020 – refusal to issue an identity card to the applicant and recognise him as Azerbaijani national, although he possessed official papers attesting to his nationality;
- Ghoumid and Others v. France, 2020 – deprivation of citizenship on the basis of a conviction for a terrorism offence committed over ten years earlier;
- Usmanov v. Russia, 2020 – automatic annulment of citizenship for omitting information about siblings when applying ten years earlier;
- Willems v. the Netherlands (dec.), 2021 – EU law obligation to provide fingerprints when applying for a passport and subsequent storage of the fingerprints on chip in the passport;
- S.-H. v. Poland (dec.), 2021 – refusal to grant Polish citizenship by descent to children born through surrogacy in USA to same-sex couple residing in Israel, where legal parent-child link is recognised;

- Hashemi and Others v. Azerbaijan, 2022 – refusal to issue identity cards to refugees’ children born in country and to acknowledge them as citizens on account of their parents holding another nationality;
- Johansen v. Denmark (dec.), 2022 – deprivation of nationality in the context of terrorism; see also Laraba v. Denmark (dec.), 2022;
- Emin Huseynov v. Azerbaijan (no. 2), 2023 – arbitrary revocation of the applicant’s citizenship, resulting in him becoming a stateless person, and lack of procedural safeguards.

Nationality under other Articles of the Convention

The matter is touched upon under several other Articles of the Convention.

See for example:

- Article 3: person of dual Belgian-Moroccan nationality alleging that Belgium had failed to provide him with diplomatic/consular assistance while he was imprisoned in poor conditions in Morocco: Aarrass v. Belgium (dec.), 2021;
- Article 6: (i) acquisition or withdrawal of nationality: Makuc and Others v. Slovenia (dec.), 2007; Borisov v. Lithuania, 2011; (ii) revocation of nationality (“déchéance de nationalité”): Galip v. Greece (dec.), 1994; (iii) proceedings regulating a person’s citizenship: Al Hamdani v. Bosnia and Herzegovina, 2012; (iv) the right to a passport is not a “civil right” under Article 6: Alpeyeva and Dzhalagoniya v. Russia, 2018, § 129, nor is the right to citizenship: Sergey Smirnov v. Russia (dec.), 2006;
- Article 8 combined with Article 14: Genovese v. Malta, 2012; Zeggai v. France, 2022;
- Articles 9, 10, 11 and 13: Petropavlovskis v. Latvia, 2015 ; Boudelal v. France (dec.), 2017;
- Article 3 of Protocol No. 1: inability of persons with multiple nationality to stand as candidates in parliamentary elections, reference made to the European Convention on Nationality: Tănase v. Moldova [GC], 2010;
- Article 2 of Protocol No. 4: Rotaru v. Republic of Moldova, 2020;
- Article 3 of Protocol No. 4: Slivenko v. Latvia (dec.) [GC], 2002;
